

WIRED

January 2021

The poetry of Thulani Davis captures the energy of the 1970s and 80s New York scene from a loving insider's perspective. By Phil Freeman

Writing But The Music

Thulani Davis

Book Form: 128 pages, Pbk $18.99

Thulani Davis is an author, a poet, a playwright, a screenwriter, a journalist and a Buddhist teacher. Alongside her late husband Joseph Jarman she founded the Brooklyn Buddhist Association. She collaborated with her cousin, the composer Anthony Davis, on the opera Amistad and X, The Life And Times Of Malcolm X. She wrote the screenplay for the 2002 crime film Paid In Full, and won a Grammy for her sleeve notes to the Aretha Franklin compilation Queen Of Soul: The Atlantic Recordings. She's been a newspaper reporter in San Francisco and in New York, writing for The Village Voice for more than a decade.

This slim but handsome paperback gathers poems Davis wrote between 1974-92, as the subtitle indicates, it encompasses "documentaries from nightclubs, dance halls and a tailor's shop in Dinkes." Some of them appeared previously in her books Playing The Changes and All The Renegades Shouts Blue, one served as sleeve notes to Henry Threadgill's It's 75, Vol. 1; others appeared in The Village Voice.

As a poet and a person, Davis was deeply tied into the jazz scene of the 1970s and 80s; she wrote poems and/or sleeve notes for albums including Henry Threadgill's Early Slip Into Another World, Oliver Lake's Deportable Language, John's A Message From Mountolive and Chapter Two: No, and the self-titled 1971 album by South Africa's Nkomo Kabe & The Nations. She, Jerome Ragobara and Blasde Shange performed the theater piece Where The Mississippi Meets The Amazon in New York in 1977, with a backing band consisting of saxophonist David Murray, pianist Anthony Davis, guitarist Michael Gregory Jackson, bassist Fred Hopkins and drummer Freeman abLaP. The musicians captured in this book were loved more than her subjects – they were (and) her friends, her people.

Similarly, the poems are about more than music: they are about life. One titled after the first side of It's 75, Vol. 1 begins "at the turning of the day / in these winters / in the city's bottomless streets / it seems sometimes as if you behind you's back" another, inspired by a 1982 Bad Brains performance at CBGB (each poem has a note at the bottom with a date and a location and sometimes a list of who was playing), includes the lines "the only person I ever met from southeast DC / was a genius who stabbed her boyfriend / for sneaking up on her in the kitchen / she once turned her partner in did what / for making a mistake / but she would wait on a corner at night / for a guy with a suit and briefcase / who didn't want to be seen with her in the day".

The message that burns through all this work is that art and life are inseparable, that each produces the other. She doesn't glorify the musicians, or worship them, she loves them. These are love poems. □